Although social media allows users to accumulate hundreds of digital followers, psychological studies show that human beings can only maintain a handful of deeply meaningful relationships. Online interactions often emphasize superficial image curation rather than emotional honesty. Therefore, having two or three genuine companions in real life is incomparably more valuable than possessing thousands of virtual connections.

State the main conclusion of the argumentative passage regarding real versus online friendships.

Cevap: The main conclusion is that having a small circle of authentic, real-life friends is vastly superior to having thousands of superficial online followers.
Depth of trust and authentic personal connection matter far more for human well-being than numerical social media metrics.
